Internal Quality Assurance Cell (IQAC),
Arunachal University of Studies, Namsai

Target Participants: Faculty members from Colleges and Universities (Multidisciplinary)

About the Workshop

Climate change is a serious threat to socio-economic development globally and in India. The effect of climate change on the biophysical and social systems are expected to vary significantly in different parts of India and will be determined by both global and local factors. Climate change phenomenon is especially caused by human activities and is a growing challenge to humanity and sustainable development. The impact of climate change and climate hazards is not uniform across space and time. It varies across regions due to differences in the level of exposure and vulnerability of various systems, be it ecosystems, economic sectors, or social groups. For these reasons, assessment of the vulnerability of a system is one of the critical steps to identify appropriate adaptation measures to adapt to climate change risks as also to cope with current climate risks. The workshop would help us to understand the potential impacts of climate change by evaluating the magnitude of potential effects of climate change in different areas to identify appropriate adaptation measures to combat climate change as also to cope with current climate risks.
